Critical Essay Writing

- Use the BBC Bitesize sites for their tips on improving critical essays.
- Use the English Department's resources to show you how to write good introductions, essay paragraphs, analyse and evaluate correctly.
- Read over your notes and texts so that they are firmly embedded in your mind. You should revise English at least once a week for a whole night – or better, revise a little each night so it's firmly implanted in your mind for May!
- Use the SQA website to build yourself a Revision Timetable and start now. For Higher – it's about the practice for an A.
- Practice building 'skeleton essays' which have your introduction points laid out, your PEE paragraphs and conclusion. These are great to help you work out structure issues, so you definitely include a quote, analysis and evaluation, as well as refer back to the question/task.
- Time yourself writing critical essays so that you are comfortable writing in 45 – 50 minutes.
- Practice, practice, practice.

Scottish Set Text Section

- Read over your Scottish Text(s) regularly – you cannot learn it all the night before! Take it slowly; read them regularly and your notes too.
- Print off blank copies of your poems/sections of your play and annotate them from memory – see what you already know, and add to them daily.
- Build tables of comparisons between characters, poems, themes or anything else you could possibly compare.
- Practice the 10 mark answer by making comparisons between poems, prose and drama based on themes; narrative voice; similar techniques; style of writing; key scenes... the list goes on and on...
- Use the SQA website and the Critical reading past papers to see what types of questions they ask for your Set Text.
- There's SQA-endorsed books out there for Critical Reading. These may help – but check they have your texts first, before you spend the money.

Revise – there's nothing better than good old-fashioned hard work. Attend study; ask questions; do extra work and get it marked. Your best resource is your teacher!
